

ARIC PRESS

Aric Press became the editor in chief of The American Lawyer in February 1998. He joined the magazine after working as a writer and an editor at Newsweek for almost 19 years.

During his tenure at The American Lawyer, the magazine has expanded its reach, shortened its stories, and put a renewed emphasis on public service by lawyers and law firms. The magazine has won a series of national journalism and design awards and is generally recognized as the leading publication covering law firms and their business. Mr. Press also serves as the editorial director of Incisive Media's national magazine group. In that capacity he oversees Corporate Counsel, IP Law & Business, Law Technology News, Focus Europe, the Minority Law Journal, and the editorial group at Law.com.

Aric Press is a graduate of Cornell University and New York University Law School. He lives with his wife and three children in Brooklyn, New York.
